Description
Outdoor Behavioral Healthcare is a mental or behavioral health intervention for children and adolescents with emotional, adjustment, addiction, and/or psychological problems. The intervention typically involves immersion in the wilderness or wilderness-like setting, group living with peers, the administration of individual and group therapy sessions, and educational/therapeutic curricula including backcountry travel and wilderness living skills. This type of therapy aims to remove children and adolescents from the negative influences and destructive patterns in their lives by placing them in a supportive environment. It has close ties to nature therapy and therapeutic recreation, and may offer an alternative to more traditional residential therapy programs or be used as an adjunctive therapeutic modality. There are several program models that further define the degree of utilization of the wilderness experience in providing treatment services for the adolescents. Program models may include but are not limited to the following: contained expedition programs, continuous flow expedition programs, base camp expedition programs and residential expedition programs. All such programs differentiate themselves from wilderness boot camps which rely heavily on punishments, confrontation and deprivation in order to gain compliance and obedience.

Though each program may draw from many therapeutic paradigms contributing to the uniqueness of their approach, common therapeutic factors are found: promotion of self-efficacy through task accomplishment; restructuring of the therapist-client relationship; promotion of group cohesion and development through group living.

Outdoor behavioral healthcare may also be known as adventure therapy, wilderness therapy or wilderness adventure therapy, nature-based therapy or nature-assisted therapy, and are often used interchangeably.
